LARGE-HEARTEDNESS OF BANDIT JUAN VESQUEZ POINTED OUT BY ONE WHO KNEW OF GOOD DEED

BY C. F. M.

Noting in the papers recently the death of the mother of Juan Vasquez, the once noted robber of the central and southern parts of California, more especially through the counties of Monterey, San Benito and San Luis Obispo, which he and his gang terrorized into complete submission, and who eventually received justice at the end of a rope, I thought it might not be out of place to relate a story in connection with Vasquez that goes to show that he was not bad clear through and this one act may have a tendency to soften, in a slight degree, the hard feeling that to this day comes to the surface with the mention of his name throughout the territory where he practised his "profession."

Vasquez was the acknowledged head and captain of a gang that infested the counties above named. Any history of California will relate the "standing" the gang had in the communities it ruled over. It is sufficient to say that no member of the gang was denied any "request" he might make of ranchers or others. The Vasquez gang had a "standing" that none ever attempted to dispute. It was stated by Vasquez when he was about to "dance on air" that he had never killed a person, and I, who was personally acquainted with the man, believed him. He could rob a man or a company of men with a sang-froid that is met with in but few and at the same time he was as quick as a cat to note any move either before or behind him that might mean danger to himself. The writer was not present at the occurrence below related but was within a few miles of the spot at the time and can vouch for the truth of it.

Some three years previous to the occurrence about to be related, Vasquez (himself not being present) made a raid on the Smith (that name being as good as any for the occasion) stock ranch for the purpose of replenishing its supply of horses. Smith was a hard-working rancher, with a wife and two children, one of them being a boy of about 11 years of age, the other was younger. Smith had got hold of the ranch some years before, and not being a practical rancher he had had a pretty hard scramble to make, both ends meet and keep up the interest on the mortgage that was on the place. During the raid of Vasquez' gang Smith undertook to thwart the robbers and consequently was shot down, as would have been a dog that had attempted to bite one of the gang.

Passing over the details that followed the burial of Mr. Smith and the boy, the boy of the poverty-stricken family that had been left to struggle on as best it could, brings the story up to a year later when one day Vasquez alone stopped at the Smith ranch and demanded a good dinner, stating that he would pay for it, which Vasquez did; at the same time acquainting the widow of his identity. Widow Smith, through fear and trembling, served the highwayman chief with the best her kitchen could furnish, which was not much. At times she wished she had a dose of poison to place in the food she was serving, but his eyes were ever on her. He rode away, after thanking her, stating that he would call again.

Two years after, the widow Smith made a trip to the county seat to see if there was any possibility of extending the mortgage that would fall due the following month. Little & Morse, the holders of the mortgage, closed, soulless, and not averse to pressing the widow or orphan, having ascertained the value of the ranch to be far in excess of the mortgage thereon, and thinking to get the property thus cheaply, positively refused to extend the time of payment one hour, the poor widow leaving their office with tears streaming down her cheeks. They had utterly refused to listen to her prayer for an extension of time.

On the day that the mortgage fell due, and on which widow Smith expected to be made to vacate the ranch that had been her home so long, Vasquez rode up to the door, tied his horse and again demanded for some dinner, stating that the quality of the previous dinner he had eaten there was the cause of his return.

After finishing his repast, he inquired: "What makes you look so worried, widow Smith? Some trouble ahead? No fear of my boys ever coming here again; I have stopped that." Telling one's troubles even to a highway robber seemed a relief to widow Smith. She related to Vasquez the whole story of her prayers to the foreclosers on her home to extend the time; of her refusal to do so and of the troubled straits she expected to enter, upon being thrown out of her farm. Of the fate of the children, and soul together. Also, of the fact that she expected Little & Morse there that very day to demand the satisfaction of the mortgage or throw her and the children out onto the county road.

Vasquez, after inquiring the amount of the mortgage, gave a shrug of his shoulders, characteristic of the Mexican, and mounting his horse, rode slowly to the first turn in the road a short distance from the house, but after rounding the short curve he was hidden from view. It was then that Vasquez sank his wicked spurs into his horse's flanks, and in a few moments he was but a speck crossing the range on the other side of the gulch. In an hour Vasquez again entered Widow Smith's ranch house, throwing a bag of gold upon the table. Be exclaimed: "There, Widow Smith, is $2000. You pay the mortgage with that. You needn't let it bother you about paying it back for lawlike." Then turning to the door he continued: "I am going to the barn for a little snooze," and he stalked off in the direction of the barn with his horse tagging behind, leaving the widow dumfounded.

Storming with rage over the fact that the widow was in some unaccountable way prepared to, and did meet the mortgage, and thereby cancelled the indebtedness that otherwise would have given them the richest ranch in that valley, Little and Morse rode slowly away from the ranch house, their faces turned toward it in taking in a last look at what they thought, a couple of hours before, would be theirs on easy terms.

The horse that Morse was riding gave a slight, startled move which caused both men to face ahead, and in doing so they gazed into the barrels of a couple of 12-inch Colt's revolvers. "Buenas dias, senors," said Vasquez. "I must apologize for thus suddenly asking for a little assistance in the way of money, but the fact is, I must have some and quickly. Just shell out liberally and you will soon be on your way rejoicing."

As Vasquez gathered into himself the $2000 that Widow Smith had just paid them, he also annexed what jewelry and loose change each had on his person.

"Adios, senors," said Vasquez. "You may ride on toward town, and I will follow at a safe distance."
